7. A Study on Social Transformation in Rural India: Women Empowerment

Dr. Madhura Kalamkar
I/C Principal, HVPS College of Law.

Abstract

Women empowerment isn't meant for just women, this is a practice which involves sincerity, earnestness and capacity and capability on the part of both men and women. It is a challenging task in rural India as even today women cannot take any self-decisions as she is still worn down by the clutches of the ancient programmed beliefs and so she cannot see herself without the Other i.e. her husband and her son. The problem faced for the women participation in various fields due to illiteracy, family responsibilities, lack of decision making freedom, and communication involvement in the family discussions, poor socio-economic background and most importantly patriarchal system prevail still in rural areas. Can we measure or enumerate the women's freedom and choice? What do they reveal about the circumstances and what does equality mean to women in India? Can they exercise their right to live with dignity?

Key words: Social Transformation, Women Empowerment, Limitation and benefits of social transformation.

India is a land of diversity. Among all the type of varieties, rural-urban divide is the most glaring one. Indian women, no doubt, to the extent their societal position is concerned, they are not treated as equivalent to men in every footstep. Indeed, even today gender disabilities and discriminations are found in India. However, the kind of problems face by urban women is totally different from that of a women living in rural area.

The role of woman in politics, social and economic development keeps on changing continuously and these is one of the essential dynamic system of human life. The changing of life is an ongoing process, which is never ending. There has been remarkable link between social changes and legal laws. Now the questin arise that what is meant by social changes?. It means changing life which is not similar to their parent's or they lived previously. Social change denotes to any substantial modification after some time in standards of conduct and cultural.
